Many of these peaks rise far above 4,000 meters, and the thin air can affect travelers differently depending on their health and experience. Planning ahead and giving your body time to adapt will make your journey much more enjoyable.

When visiting high-altitude destinations, travelers should allow time for acclimatization in cities like Cusco, Huaraz, or Arequipa. Staying hydrated, eating lightly, and avoiding fast ascents helps reduce discomfort. If you're sensitive to altitude or planning a demanding trek, consult your doctor about preventative options before your trip. You can also coordinate with a Peru tour operator, as they often provide guidance, acclimatization-friendly itineraries, and support to help you adjust safely while enjoying your adventure.
